MARTIAL TUNES CAUSE NEAR WAR

Chicago Symphony Orchestra Members in Uproar Over National Airs at Ravinia.

NOW ALL ARE BARRIED.

The "war" began on Friday, when the Chicago Symphony orchestra served up the martial strains of "The Star Spangled Banner" at Ravinia Park. At the time, the audience was quite pleased with the program, which offered the usual fare of Wagner and Bizet. The orchestra was conducted by Charles M. Taft, and the audience was composed of many of the city's leading citizens.

But on Monday night, when the program was repeated, a different response was observed. The crowd was on edge, and the atmosphere was tense. The performance of "The Star Spangled Banner" was met with mixed reactions, and it was clear that not everyone was pleased with the choice of music.

This prompted a discussion among the orchestra members, who were divided on the issue. Some members felt that the performance should continue as planned, while others believed that the use of national airs was inappropriate and should be stopped.

In an effort to resolve the matter, the orchestra's conductor, Charles M. Taft, held a meeting with the members to discuss their concerns. After much debate, a compromise was reached, and it was decided that the "Star Spangled Banner" would be performed, but only in a manner that respected the traditions and values of the nation.

The orchestra's decision was met with a mixed response from the audience. Some members of the crowd were pleased with the compromise, while others were disappointed that the "war" had not been fully resolved. However, it was clear that the issue had been brought to the forefront, and that the orchestra was working to address it in a responsible manner.
